

Now, when we do something like this, it is for the purpose of transmitting energy from one place to another, so, maybe this is what happened with this original device. Here we can visualize some means contained within one container generating an extremely high pressure within some relatively incompressible fluid, transmitting this fluid to the other container where it could turn a turbine or similar device to generate, say, electricity to be used by the beings who built it for their own purposes.

If we reason what we would likely do under similar circumstances, and look about us for similar devices, it is quite logical to conclude that this device was just a semi-portable electric generator, obtaining its prime energy possibly from some "gravity head" generator. It may have been used in the assembly of orbital space craft, and having served its purpose was set adrift, how long ago we have no estimate, eventually to drift down to earth.

If the foregoing speculation is correct, we would do well to examine closely this wreckage to try and determine as much as possible of the technology which may be locked within it.